

IPS Employee Feature: Jorge Guerra

Every agricultural business has the need for "doing the heavy lifting." At IPS, Jorge Guerra is one of those people.

Jorge has been working at IPS since August 2020 as the Shipping Coordinator. In this role, Jorge packages, ships and unpackages semen tanks. He also works with inventory and fills in various other roles at the Rock Springs office.

Jorge is originally from Ecuador. In high school and university, his studies focused in the areas of accounting, business administration and science. Jorge worked in warehouse management for several years, including managing a very large warehouse for a beverage company. Fifteen years ago, Jorge and his wife Veronica came to the United States. He worked at a nearby printing facility until it closed last summer. While Jorge had an opportunity to take a position at a different location for the same company, he and his wife wanted to stay in the area with their three children. A position at IPS made this possible.

As part of the IPS team, Jorge is learning a new industry ... and he loves it! He has been surprised by how much information there is to learn. "It has made me realize how little many people know about our type of business," Jorge says. He enjoys the many different tasks he performs at IPS and constantly learning new things.

"Because of the amount of international business that we do, having another Spanish-speaking person in the office is also an advantage," says Ron Serland, CEO and President of IPS.
